A CENTRAL AFRICAN DANDY

It will be seen that the colored dandy whose portrait is here given wears a filet, narrings, a collar and a Lolero of beads, plus—and this is the most important—a pair of spectacles with head frames. There is no glass to the spectacles, which are obviously worn as an aid to beauty, in the belief that the white man wears his spectacles as ornaments, not for any utilitarian purpose.

The cutate was valued at about $1,200 About ten years ago Hammond Floreter so it is alleged, became dis satisfied and, enlisting the support of his brother, put in the claim that they had not received proper treatment in the distribution of the estate. A legal fight was made to obtain possession of part of it.

It is affected that their claim called for more than the estate was valued at. The matter was carried from one court to another until it reached the highest tribunal. The findings were alwaxs for the widow, her fight being handled by the son. Ora Titcomb.

The estate could not, however, be legally settled until the ownership of the pew had been established time ago the widow Mrs Fletcher, sold the pew to her son, Walter Tit-comb for $20, and the claim was made by one of the Fleichers that the pew was worth $150.

In the probate court at East Camto decide whether or not the pew came under the head of real estate. With the decision would come the final settiement of the contest that had been half-brother of William T. Taft. continued for ten years.

Pietcher claimed that his only wish was that the church pew should re- relationship.

LONG LEGAL BATTLE OVER ITS main in the family but that he did not have $150 to buy it back, whereupon the counsel for the administratrix replied that if the pew was all he wanted he could take it and consider him-self indebted to Titerants for $20. The matter was finally settled on this basis. to the satisfaction of all.
